Charles I Shillings of the York Mint (ii) Counterfeits
Gary Oddie

A previous note provided illustrations of the known official issues of the shillings from the York mint during the Civil War\(^1\). This note will present details and discuss five known varieties of counterfeit shillings which display the EBOR mintmark. Some of these show quite competent engraving skills, sufficient to allow the die that was copied to be identified.

The contemporary counterfeits showing the EBOR mint signature show letter and design punch links with each other and also with other groups of contemporary counterfeits of provincial mint shillings (Oxford).

All specimens of one York die combination show significant flan curvature pointing to manufacture on a roller or cylinder press.

Conclusions.

The diversity of the official coinages of the Civil War allowed a few groups of skilful counterfeiters to practice their craft. A detailed punch, design and metallurgical analysis might prove useful in linking the different spurious issues\(^{4,7}\), especially pieces with robust hoard dating evidence. It is also likely that some of the counterfeiters were already active at the beginning of the Civil War, with the tools and skills ready to step into the diverse circulating medium of the troubled time.

Through the Commonwealth and up to the recoinage of 1696/7, increasingly worn and clipped silver coins fell prey to the counterfeiters. The whole topic of the state of the circulating silver coinage in the seventeenth century requires a thorough review in order to place what seems to be a continuous undercurrent of counterfeiting in its proper context.

For the York cft types 1-4 the lace collar has been created using a common punch.

Similarly the punch used to create the wavy hair design of York cft type 5 would appear to be the same as that used to make a group of Oxford type counterfeits, shown below.
